Circular Economy: Policies and Practices of Local Governments in China

Abstract (Should be no more than 150 words):

- I. Circular economy has become China’s long-term strategy
- II. Policy and practice of local governments in promoting circular economy, taking Shandong Province as an example
- III. Case study: Scheme for implementation of circular economy in Zibo City

The notion of developing circular economy and building a conservation-conscious society has become a long-term national strategy for sustainable development in China. Many important circular economy-related laws and regulations of state level are under way of promulgation. To develop circular economy in China is turning into a massive social practice. Local authorities of all level stipulate various kinds of laws and regulations of circular economy, formulating the clean production legislation, making the rules about the energy conservation and resources use and protection, especially building local laws and regulations of environmental protection. To implement the policy of circular economy, local governments also make long term plan, including promoting the standards, establishing targets, providing financial supports and technical support, taking methods of economical rewards and punishment, providing education and training, strengthening communication and cooperation.
